

Dear Hiring Team,

Hightouch helps companies activate their data — so it's fitting that the RevOps Analyst role demands someone who treats data quality and operational alignment as foundational, not as afterthoughts. That's the approach I bring.

At RollWorks/AdRoll, I was the person on the sales team who actually cared about CRM hygiene. Not because I had to, but because I saw how clean data directly translated to better pipeline outcomes. I built automated workflows with Clay.com to ensure prospect data was accurate before it entered the system, maintained forecasting integrity across a 700+ account territory, and generated $1.205M in ARR opportunities because I trusted — and validated — the data driving my decisions. At WeFund Mortgage, I built similar AI-assisted systems with OpenClaw to track pipeline data across multiple stakeholders and catch data quality issues before they compounded.

My background is sales execution rather than traditional RevOps, but the work I've done is RevOps work — CRM administration, data quality ownership, pipeline reporting, process optimization, and cross-functional alignment between sales, marketing, and customer success. I've been doing it from a revenue seat, and I want to do it full-time at a company where data operations is the product, not just an internal function.

Hightouch's remote-first culture and focus on data activation align with both where I want to work and how I want to work. I'd welcome the chance to discuss how I can contribute.

Best regards, Perry Tusler pgtusler@gmail.com | 608-332-9579