

Dear Hiring Team,

Paddle's position as payments infrastructure for software companies makes the GTM Operations Analyst role especially compelling — you're selling a product that helps other companies operationalize their revenue, and the ops team needs to exemplify that same rigor internally.

My background is revenue execution, but the work I'm most proud of is operational. At RollWorks/AdRoll, I built automated workflows with Clay.com and AI that transformed how we prioritized a 700+ account territory — replacing gut-feel prospecting with data-driven process optimization. I maintained the CRM hygiene and forecasting accuracy that gave stakeholders across sales, marketing, and leadership confidence in pipeline reporting. The $1.205M in ARR opportunities I generated was a direct result of better operational systems, not more activity.

What I bring to the GTM Operations Analyst role is perspective from the field. I understand what sales teams need from ops because I've lived the pain of bad data, broken processes, and reports that don't answer the actual question. At WeFund Mortgage, I built AI-assisted workflows with OpenClaw to solve exactly those problems — automating data flows, tracking conversion patterns, and giving myself the operational visibility that should come from a dedicated ops function.

Paddle's emphasis on actionable insights and cross-functional collaboration matches how I naturally work. I'd love to bring that experience to a team that's building it at scale.
