

Dear Hiring Team,

The Sales Strategy Analyst role on Samsara's Emerging Sales Strategy team is exactly the kind of work I want to do next. A 0 → 1 environment where you're building foundational reporting, defining processes, and acting as a strategic partner — that's the kind of operational challenge I've consistently chosen throughout my career.

At WeFund Mortgage, I built an operation from scratch: no existing reporting, no defined processes, no operational playbook. I designed pipeline analytics, automated workflows with OpenClaw, and established the operational standards that turned an early-stage business into a functioning revenue machine. Before that, at RollWorks/AdRoll, I built foundational prospecting infrastructure using Clay.com and AI for emerging account segments — defining new processes and creating the reporting that didn't exist yet. The $1.205M in ARR and 15/18 months of quota attainment came from building the systems, not just executing within existing ones.

Samsara's scale — public company, high-growth, crossing from $40M to $100M+ — is compelling because I've operated in environments where speed matters and operational infrastructure is what separates scaling from scrambling. My background in revenue execution gives me a perspective that pure analysts sometimes lack: I know what sales teams actually use, what reporting they ignore, and what processes create friction versus reducing it.

I'm based in LA, fully remote-capable, and excited about the chance to build something foundational at Samsara.
